IS IT SAFETY COMPLIANCE or SAFETY CULTURE?

I am going to continue the thought process from last month's newsletter in the article titled "Risk Analysis, Compliance, and Developing a Culture of Safety".

When you are driving, do you consciously think "am I complying with all of the traffic regulations"? Or, do you drive the way you do because that is the way that you were trained so long ago and believe the way to keep from becoming involved in a vehicle accident is to drive following established procedures to include staying on your side of the double yellow line?

As you are working, do you consciously think "am I complying with all the safety procedures"? Or, do you just work doing what you are trained to do, following the established work procedures because you believe they are the safest and most efficient way to do the task?

Is it peer-pressure that causes us to stay on our side of the double yellow line or is it the culture of driving meaning it is just the way that we do it?
